Previous studies have shown that sepsis, a systemic inflammatory response to a bacterial infection, results in the increased production of nitric oxide (NO) by the gut. NO production increases during sepsis, peaks 7 days after the onset of sepsis, and returns to normal levels 14 days after the onset of sepsis. Administration of NO donors to septic animals prevents mortality associated with sepsis. To determine if this improvement is associated with changes in inducible NO synthase (iNOS) expression in the small intestine, jejunum, or colon, we measured iNOS mRNA expression following sepsis and iNOS expression was examined in the presence and absence of L-N6,O2'-dibutyryl-cGMP (db-cGMP), an activator of soluble guanylate cyclase. There was an approximately 16-fold increase in the expression of iNOS mRNA in the jejunum 7 days after sepsis compared with sham, returning to normal levels 14 days after the onset of sepsis. Administration of L-N6,O2'-db-cGMP to septic animals prevented the increase in iNOS expression. Expression of the small intestine marker villin mRNA was decreased following the induction of sepsis. These data show that sepsis-induced changes in iNOS expression in the small intestine are not required for the beneficial effects of L-N6,O2'-db-cGMP.A stereophotogrammetric analysis of the relative mandibular position after different surgical treatments for temporomandibular joint ankylosis.
